Debris from China rocket falls into Indian Ocean

KJM VARMA Beijing The remnants of an out of control and China's biggest rocket re-entered the Earth's atmosphere with most of its parts burned up and disintegrated over the Indian Ocean near the Maldives, the country's space agency said on Sunday, ending days of fevered speculation over where the debris would hit. US and European tracking sites had been monitoring the uncontrolled fall of the rocket. Monitoring service Space-Track, which uses US military data, also confirmed the re-entry. The US Space command confirmed the re-entry into the atmosphere of

It is clear that China is failing to meet responsible standards regarding their space debris." Bill Nelson NASA Administrator "The exact location of the impact and the span of debris, both of which are unknown at this time, will not be released by US Space Command," it said in a statement. Harvard astrophysicist Jonathan McDowell, who tracked the tumbling rocket part, wrote on Twitter, "An ocean reentry was always statistically the most likely. It appears China won its gamble... But it was still reckless." The rocket, carrying the core module for China's Tiangong Space Station, blasted off from the Wenchang Spacecraft Launch Site on the southern island province of Hainan on April 29. The large rocket stage that (de-orbit) was more than 33 metres (108 feet) tall and weighed more than 20 tonnes, making it the sixth largest object to re-enter the Earth's atmosphere. Very little of the rocket stage's mass survived re-entry, however, with the majority having burned up as it entered the Earth's dense at-phere at a speed of about 8km (five miles) per second. NASA Administrator Bill Nelson issued a statement saying: "It is clear that China is failing to meet responsible standards regarding their space debris." "Spacefaring nations must minimize the risks to people and property on Earth of re-entries of space objects and maximize transparency regarding those operations. It is critical that China and all spacefaring nations and commercial entities act responsibly and transparently in space to ensure the safety, stability, security, and long-term sustainability of outer space activities," Nelson said.
